

Allure

Kai stepped into the water, completely discarding his phone along with Matt's onto the dark soil. And he too snapped out of the trance when the freezing water kissed his face. He gasped, choking on the water that rushed in his mouth. He fought to break through the surface as well, but his attempts were in vain when the water yanked him under.

Kai desperately held his breath and kicked frantically, but it was as if the water pushed him further down. His lungs burned from the lack of oxygen, but he refused to breathe in. However, he didn't have to, for the water forced his mouth open and pushed itself down his throat and up his nose. An excruciating pain pierced him as the water filled his lungs.

He lost the will to continue fighting, but as he sank to the bottom, he felt oddly calm. A serene peaceful feeling overcame him. The water around him seemed to glow as the moonlight pierced through, illuminating everything.

He laid on the bottom of the lake near Matt, whose still eyes held the same calm. But the last thing he saw, before everything stopped, were the hundreds of bodies also lying on the sandy embankment.
